GVSU is a public university that is nationally ranked by US News and World Report. Dr. Lancaster is also a Research Fellow with the international Michigan Virtual Learning Research Institute. He began his professor journey 23 years ago and has taught courses around technology in education, special education, and English language learning. Prior to his current administrative position, Dr. Lancaster served as a Department Chair of Literacy and Technology, which included a graduate program in English Language Learning. He earned his Ph.D. from the University of Kansas, which had the #1 ranked Special Education program and provided him with a strong focus on phonemic awareness, phonics, and vocabulary, which has been beneficial when teaching English language learning classes. Dr. Lancaster has won three teaching awards during his tenure as a professor, including a unanimous selection as Outstanding Teacher from the graduate students at the university. He has also won many millions of dollars in National Institutes of Health (NIH) research funding through the years to develop educational software. His research has most recently explored how teaching pedagogies can best make learning equitable for students who have traditionally been marginalized.

ABSTRACT

Research conducted at universities across the world makes vast contributions to the knowledge base in our respective fields and leads to advances that improve our world. An equally important contribution made in universities is in the provision of high-quality education, training, and preparation to students who will become future leaders and problem solvers. The ever-present and rapid-paced access to information insists on the use of instructional pedagogies that promote discernment, critical thinking, and discourse. This talk provides an examination of evidence-based practices focused on such pedagogies. Dr. Sean Lancaster will engage the audience in a discussion of ongoing research on essential pedagogical practices that technology can enhance and that engage all students.

ABSTRACT

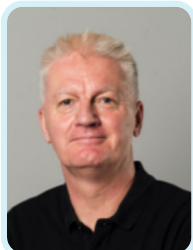

Are differences in kinship terms among different countries determined by cultural or linguistic factors? This talk provides an empirical examination of how native speakers of different languages introduce their relatives through surveys and corpora analysis. The results show that the linguistic system in kinship exerts an influence on the way people address their relatives, providing strong evidence for the theory that language structure influences cognition. Furthermore, this talk also discusses the reasons why language systems influence kinship terminology from the perspective of linguistic features and human cognitive tendencies, and explores the interrelationship and interaction between language and culture, revealing the influence of language on culture and emphasizing the important role of language in the progress of human civilization.

Dr. Kevin BalchinDirector of the Centre for Language and Linguistics
Canterbury Christ Church University, UK

Speech Title: Reflection in English Language Teacher Education

BIO

Dr. Kevin Balchin is currently the Director of the Centre for Language and Linguistics at Canterbury Christ Church University. He has been working at the University since 2002 and before that taught English as a Foreign Language in Spain and Russia for seven years. In recent years, he has been involved in several international projects, such as with the British Council in Bangladesh, as well as contributing to a number of undergraduate and postgraduate programmes and supervising doctoral students. He's currently supervising PhDs relating to different aspects of teacher education, English language teaching methodology, and the integration of technology into language classes. His research interests are in English language teacher education and incorporating technology into English language teaching.

ABSTRACT

This talk considers student teacher reflection on English Language teacher training programmes. It discusses the degree to which student teachers are equipped to reflect effectively, the purpose(s) of reflection within the training programme, the depth and scope of the reflections that take place, and the role of emotions in the reflection process. As a student on English Language teacher training programmes, I was often asked to reflect on my teaching, and now, as a teacher trainer on similar programmes, I find myself asking my own student teachers to do the same. However, I've recently begun to question the reflection process, including whether student teachers are given enough guidance on reflection in the first place. Drawing upon the seminal work of Schön (1983, 1987) on reflective practice and more recently the work of Farrell (2015) on 'promoting teacher reflection in second language teacher education', issues considered in this talk include:

- the extent to which student English Language teachers feel equipped to reflect on their teaching;
- the extent to which student teacher reflection should focus on the 'here and now' of teaching;
- the extent to which student teacher reflection helps to develop the necessary skills to embark upon and sustain a career in teaching; and
- the impact of emotions on student teacher reflection.

Among the conclusions reached are that student English Language teachers' reflections can often be primarily concerned with solving their surface-level and immediate problems in the classroom. If student teachers are to be encouraged to move beyond this, then there is a need for greater levels of guidance before and during the reflection process, for the process itself to be more clearly defined and structured, and for the emotions involved in reflective process to be recognised

ABSTRACT

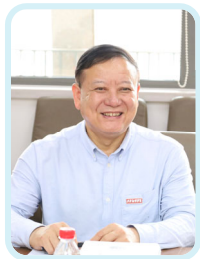

This presentation introduces the SoTL (Scholarship of Teaching and Learning) design in humanities courses focusing on critical issues at the center of discussion. SoTL involves faculty undertaking systematic inquiry about student learning, which can help faculty to maintain more reflective and scholarly educators. The research will demonstrate how to engage the students to view social justice issues through humanities contents of "Topics on East Asia Languages and Cultures in Contact." From the perspectives of the language and cultural connections among China, Korea, and Japan through the lens of social justice, students will learn not only the Chinese language in contact with the other two Asian languages globally, accompanied by information on geography, history, culture, etc. but also will learn how language and culture shape the views of people in the world and pertinent information on language-related social justice issues. The presentation will exemplify how the language and cultural contents impact the interdisciplinary curriculum map of higher education.
